

HMRC Investigations pose
a real risk to all

We can help you avoid getting stung by the cost

A tax investigation could cost you money... even if you've done nothing wrong

The Revenue's powerful new computer system 'Connect' is helping their drive to increase tax collection and the number of investigations initiated by it are growing.

Its basic job is to scour vast databanks of personal and commercial information, seeking to unearth links between individual taxpayers and businesses, income, assets and transactions.

It then matches its findings against the information the taxpayer has provided through their return. Discrepancies are flagged and could prompt a tax investigation.

Anyone can be selected for investigation – whether a business owner, director or an individual tax payer.

Unless you have the right professional support in place, you could find yourself exposed and having to deal with costly business disruption, probing questions and the risk of incurring unplanned accountancy fees. Even if you are found to owe no tax at all, you will still have to pay for the professional fees incurred in handling your case.

Getting us involved at the start of an investigation is likely to increase your chances of a successful outcome.

How CCH Premier Protection® has helped clients

Mr Smith

When Mr. Smith filed a return showing zero self employment income, HMRC initiated an enquiry to look at the amount of interest declared. They had incorrectly thought that the interest had been understated; it hadn't, therefore no additional tax was payable. The costs of professional fees for this very simple matter would have amounted to nearly £900.

Building Firm

HMRC questioned Building firm 'X' about Construction Industry Scheme payments. The investigation found that no additional tax was payable; in fact, the firm received a refund from HMRC. Despite this, professional costs would have been over £2,100.

Whilst both of the above examples demonstrate that no additional tax was payable, the fees alone would have caused serious problems for both parties had they not been protected by our tax investigation service.
